

Consider a public health nursing career in ALASKA

Take part in a rewarding adventure

My wife and I moved to Southwest Alaska in 2004 to work for the Section of Public Health Nursing. Public Health Nursing in Alaska has a long and storied history. It remains the only Section in the Alaska Division of Public Health with staff located outside major cities. We were grateful for the opportunity to work in partnership with Alaska Native communities to identify and address challenging public health issues from the prevention and management of tuberculosis to advocacy for in-home water and wastewater services.

Currently, my growing family and I live in Juneau (considered one of the most beautiful state capitals in the nation due to its majestic mountains, rivers, glaciers and forests). I now serve as the Deputy Chief for the Section of Public Health Nursing and focus on ensuring our clinical services and community wide interventions are evidence based, culturally centered, empowerment focused, and grounded in the recognition of the social, environmental and economic determinants that impact disparities in health outcomes.

If you are interested in blending the art and science of both nursing and public health to address public health issues like obesity, vaccine preventable diseases, domestic violence, substance abuse, emergency preparedness and communicable diseases through community based participatory action; then the Section of Public Health Nursing in the State of Alaska will be thrilled to have you on our team.

We currently have several openings across the state. Please contact Jerrine Regester if you are interested in working with a dynamic organization and living in a truly unique part of the world.

Tim Struna,
Johns Hopkins Alumnus

The State of Alaska's Section of Public Health Nursing is currently searching for public health nurses. These are generalist positions with a population-based focus. Activities include infectious disease prevention, emergency preparedness, maternal child health, reproductive health, and health promotion at the systems, community and individual levels of care.

Learn more:

publichealthnursing.alaska.gov or contact Jerrine Regester at 1-800-499-2964

jerrine.regester@alaska.gov